TIP O' THE MORNING: Looks like "Quo Vadis," now at the Parkway, can set a new attendance records for movies in Madison.

EVERYTHING ABOUT THE 250th Sunday Music hour at the Wisconsin Union theater was appropriate for such an event. The program was presented by students, a faculty member, and a visiting artist, and was made up of solos and ensemble work—typical of the 250 of the series. It attracted more people than the theater could hold, which is as it should be at a celebration.

And it was an exhilarating concert. Sunday's performers were the University of Wisconsin Symphony orchestra, with Prof. Richard C. Church conducting, and Soulima Stravinsky, pianist.

A reviewer covering this orchestra gets discouraged once in a while because he finds that there are so few ways of saying the organization is better than ever. It was true again this time—so true that he is tempted to wager that you'll not find a better undergraduate orchestra of this size on any campus in the country.

In the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the slightest weakness among the violins would ruin the piece; here they opened the program with vital and constant coordination. The violas and cellos shone in a brief passage in the Mendelssohn G-minor piano concerto, and the cellos starred again in Franck's "Redemption."

The woodwinds, brasses, and even the basses had their chances in these works and the Schubert "Unfinished" symphony, and all made the most of them.

For the color, the unanimity of spirit, and the sureness of performance, one has Richard C. Church to thank.

All this stole little, however, from the acclaim with which the audience greeted Stravinsky's playing of the concerto. It is a brilliant, dashing piece, with a couple of passages of entrancing, romantic beauty in a quiet vein.

It is chiefly a show piece for the virtuosos pianist, and Stravinsky's performance was mature and able. The fireworks he loosed were in marked contrast with the calm playing on a group of Scarlatti sonatas earlier in the afternoon.

ORCHESTRA KEYS: Key awards for 1952 have been given 12 members of the University Symphony orchestra of their work in that organization, it was announced Sunday.
