SPOTLIGHT

'Born Yesterday'

TIP O' THE MORNING: "From Here to Eternity" set a new opening-day record for New York's Capitol theater—and followed it up with a new second-day record.

JOAN GEBHARD played it smart at the Wisconsin Union theater Thursday night. Appearing as Billie Dawn in "Born Yesterday," she didn't try to imitate Judy Holliday, who portrayed the dumb blonde—turned smart on Broadway and in films.

In fact, Miss Gebhard's Billie matured more completely than Miss Holliday's as the play moved along, which was all to the good.

One hardly realized it at first, but the leading woman of Garson Kanin's comedy so dominated the stage that, after her final exit, the action seemed anti-climactic, the last scene an ineffectual moralizing.

This was the story of Harry Brock's invasion of Washington to put over a world-wide combination of junk yards and his mistake in attempting to make his mistress acceptable to Washington society. His try was just too good. She learned to read, she acquired a civic conscience, and she wrecked Harry's scheme. On top of that, she fell in love with the man he had hired as her teacher.

Wallace Bruhholz played Brock, money-crazed, literal-minded, and utterly selfish. He tried just a little too hard to make Harry brutal and domineering, with the result that Brock became unreal. In the end, ineffectual. There were times when he made the man live as in a scene in which he tried to play the gentleman before a senator's wife; and he succeeded, where Lon Chaney had failed in the 1949 performance at the Parkway theater, in making Brock's profanity truly in character.

The play was packed with laughs, particularly in a riotous running game between Billie and Brock and in the girl's hastily-corrected misuses and mispronunciations of nearly-learned words.

Miss Gebhard, with Bruhholz as a foil, kept the play moving, in spite of weaknesses in the rest of the cast. R. D. Grignon, as her teacher, was stiff and unnatural in speech as well as movement, and William Dawson overdid the inherent weakness of Brock's lawyer.

There were bright spots in Blandford Jennings' portrayal of the weakling senator whom Brock had bought and in Roslyn Yager's bit as a pert maid.

Ken Kala's setting—a super-swank hotel room—was excellent.

The play will close Saturday night.

BAND CONCERT: Music representing nine countries will make up the program which Prof. Raymond F. Dvorak, director of bands at the University of Wisconsin, has chosen for Sunday's concert at Vilas park.

He will conduct the Madison Musicians Assn. band, augmented by members of the university bands. The free concert will begin at 3 p. m.

Plans to have the School Savings Bond program instituted in schools throughout the state have been started by the Wisconsin School Savings Advisory Committee, headed by George E. Watson, state superintendent of public instruction.

Under the plan the children would be able to buy small amounts of stamps, from 10 cents to $1 worth each week, and would receive a $25 savings bond when they fill a book with $18.75 worth of stamps.

The Wisconsin Bankers Association is cooperating with the committee in getting the program under way.

Other Madison members of the committee are Robert C. Clark, state 4-H leader, and C. L. Greiber, state director of vocational and adult education.
