JACOBY ON BRIDGE

By Oswald Jacoby

Certain unfortunate hands give you a big thrill even if you happen to be on the wrong side of them. After a short time, the sting of defeat vanishes, and you are able to view the hand with pride.

For example, take the case of the player who held the West cards in the hand given today. He wasn't very pleased with the results at first, but he gained a bridge story that very few bridge players will be able to top. West made an opening lead that cost twenty-six tricks.

Perhaps we had better gloss over the bidding. South knew that he didn't have a real spade stopper, but he hoped that his partner would lead the suit, or that West wouldn't lead the suit, or that West would underlead the ace and king.

It didn't seem to South that he had a game in diamonds (and of course he was perfectly right) and he thought that the most likely game was at no-trump. I wouldn't dream of recommending South's bid of three no-trump, but I'm glad he made it since otherwise we wouldn't have this story.

West thought that South had a stopper in spades. In this case the only chance to bring in the spade suit consisted in leading a low spade in the hope that East had two cards in the suit and some fast entry. Hence West opened his fourth-best spade.

South won the first spade trick, and quickly took seven diamonds and five clubs for the rest of the tricks.

If West had opened the king of spades, he would have seen the whole story very quickly. He would continue with the ace of spades and then run the rest of his seven-card suit.

East would promptly discard

"LIFE WITH FATHER"

There's a new John Day in CBS Television's "Life With Father," but the chances are he won't be playing the role of the 11-year-old youngster very long.

He's Malcolm Cassel, young veteran of television and motion pictures. The reason he'll probably be "at liberty" again, before he has a chance to feel at home as a member of the Day family, is that the role for which he was signed last week has the highest turnover in show business.

During the record run of "Life With Father" on Broadway, no fewer than 90 boys came and went in the part of 11-year-old John, and it looks as though the

of the role since the show premiered on CBS Television last Nov. 22.
