Nazis May End U-Boat Packs

Allies Inflict Heavy Losses

WASHINGTON—(U.P.)—Heavy losses inflicted by Allied sea and air forces on the German U-boat fleet may compel the Nazis to abandon for good their submarine wolfpack tactics, naval experts believe.

This possibility gained strength after a joint Anglo-American statement that in November for the second successive month the number of U-boats sunk exceeded the number of their victims. Furthermore, German submarines were said to have sunk fewer Allied merchant ships in November than in any other month since May, 1940.

Experts here said development and application of new Allied counter-measures evidently had foiled a threatened U-boat resurgence in the Atlantic—a comeback which the Germans hoped to accomplish through new submarine weapons and tactics.

But now, it was said, because of their heavy losses in group operations, the Nazi U-boat fleet may return to its old hit-and-run tactics, spreading its forces over a wider area. This might force the Allies to spread their anti-submarine forces.

There has been evidence, though not wholly convincing, that the Germans already are switching to hit-and-run method and straying from the usual trans-Atlantic convoy routes. A week ago, a submarine torpedoed a Cuban freighter off Charleston, S. C.—the first U-boat appearance close to the U. S. coast in months—but this was not interpreted here to mean a return of large-scale sub warfare to the east coast waters.

The joint Anglo-American report observed that the U-boats, heretofore daring and aggressive—particularly while fighting in packs—were growing more cautious, thereby decreasing opportunities for retaliatory steps by the Allies.

The exact number of U-boats sunk in November was not disclosed but the statement indicated it was below the average for the period from May to October.
