Perils Described in Partly Cooked, Unprocessed Pork

By DR. CARL N. NEUPERT
(State Health Officer)

Eating partly cooked or unprocessed pork may result in a disease called trichinosis which causes muscular soreness, fever, and swelling under the eyes.

It is a painful and sometimes fatal disease caused by wormlike parasites called trichinae.

Pork in any form can carry the parasite.

Because sausage often contains pork which is frequently not thoroughly processed, it is an important source of the disease in man.

There is no practicable test by which presence of trichinae in pork can be detected.

Thus, the government stamp of approval on pork does not include assurance that trichinae are not present.

There is no cure for trichinosis—no known way of getting the trichinae out of the human body once they have gotten in.

Thus, the only solution to the problem of trichinosis is a program of prevention.

Hogs get trichinosis by eating scraps of infected raw pork present in garbage or by eating infected rats.

When humans eat infected pork which has not been thoroughly cooked or processed, the trichinae parasite burrows into their muscles and seals itself in the tissues in microscopic capsules, to be with them the rest of their lives.

Until better methods of control are discovered, trichinosis can be decreased by following these rules:
