World Food Supply Short, Expert Says

CHICAGO — (UP) — Only by "herculean efforts" can the world's land resources be made to yield enough food for the world's population, a geography professor says.

J. Russell Whitaker, chairman of the geography department at George Peabody college, Nashville, Tenn., told a conference here that mankind "faces very genuine limitations in his land resources for agriculture."

To meet the problem, he said, "requires greater achievements than we even approach—achievements in increased productivity per acre, in development of lands not now in crops, in the conservation of land and of fertilizer resources."
